Share ownership is offered as an incentive because workers who own shares of a company will want the company to succeed so they can earn more in dividends. They are often used as a financial incentive, but work well as a motivator as well.

Fringe Benefits

Company cars are often offered as a fringe benefit, especially to workers who have to travel for their work (for example, computer systems engineers who travel to businesses to fix network systems etc). Often, these company cars have fuel paid for by the company both during work hours and after hours, working as an incentive (especially for workers with families who may not be able to afford to run a car outside of work hours.

Holidays are used as a fringe benefit to workers. This is because many workers will not be happy to work 365 days of the year, and will often want to take a break. Extended holiday periods being offered are a good incentive as it may encourage people to apply for a job and may encourage them to work well throughout the year as they have good holiday benefits (sometimes these holidays are paid holidays).

Company pension schemes are a good incentive. This is because workers are often conscious of the fact that they will have to retire at a certain age, after which they will not be able to work any more and earn money. Company pensions also encourage workers to stay with one company so that they can build up a pension over many years. Usually workers who remain with one company have better pensions than workers who consistently change their jobs.
